The child of Buddhist parents, GP Dr Kim Loo learned early to tread lightly on the earth. Now, in addition to working with patients in communities in Western Sydney, she works to secure a sustainable future through the Council of the AMA (NSW), as former Chair of Doctors for the Environment Australia (NSW), and her many other involvements.

Kim works with Healthy Futures, a network of health professionals, students and supporters who take their professional values of protecting health and wellbeing into the community, organising collective action to reduce pollution and protect health and helping to bring a health-focus to politicians and big businesses.

“The environmental determinants of health are clean air, clean water, healthy soils, a safe climate and a healthy ecosystem. Climate change impacts you from the point of conception, depending on where you live, on your home, your education, your work...with the impacts felt most by the vulnerable and disadvantaged.”
